The majority of the cynicism and mockery as regards conventional lovers, however, comes from Launce and Speed, who serve as foils for the two protagonists, and "supply a mundane view of the idealistic flights of fancy indulged in by Proteus and Valentine. In the course of their talk, these two men exchange puns and indulge in a war of wit, they two being the fun-makers in the play.

Although not a major success the play initially ran for only six performances. Like Proteus, Felix is sent away by his father, and is followed by Felismena, who, disguised as a boy, becomes his page, only to subsequently learn that Felix has fallen in love with Celia. The production received generally positive reviews, with most critics happy to see it back on the RSC stage. For example, in his edition of the play for the New Cambridge Shakespeare Kurt Schlueter suggests that Valentine is indeed handing Silvia over to Proteus, but the audience is not supposed to take it literally; the incident is farcical and should be interpreted as .

He winds up his lecture on courtship by saying, 'That man that hath that tongue, Is an example, J.
