Cell phones tend to be places where people keep their innermost thoughts, as well as information that needs to be heavily guarded, such as credit card numbers and other personal records. Today, higher education faces an entirely different challenge – free speech is at risk now more than. While there is no denying Rights of Students (Point/Counterpoint) will be a disruption, there is no reason it needs to be destructive.

But school officials also must recognize that public school students do not. That is a very scary threat for students who want to freely express their opinions. If students are peacefully protesting with the only intention of being heard, then they are simply expressing their right to free speech. Allegations of hate speech or censorship ought to be engaged with on a case by case basis. What is great about walkouts like these is the way they allow students to make their voices truly heard, which can be difficult for minors.
