However, he decided that British prestige in the sub-continent demanded one final demonstration of Britain's military and political capabilities. Rumours that the garrison at Kabul had been wiped out had reached the defenders of Ghazni and Kandahar and of course had been made all too aware to the garrison at Jellalabad that had received the solitary survivor Dr Brydon. He almost became a victim of his own success when the Indian Office ordered him to draw down his troops and return them to India as Afghanistan appeared pacified. Unlike Elphinstone, Nott realised the danger of his position. Another source states that over one hundred British were taken prisoner. Nott realised that trouble was brewing and recalled as many of his garrisons and patrols back to Kandahar as he . They were attacked by Ghilzai warriors as they struggled through the snowbound mountains. Stepan marked it as to-read Feb 09,
