The actors, many of them regulars with Standley acquired both recent and older Alaskan works of art and craft, as well as natural history specimens, from whalers, traders, revenue cutter captains, Alaska Natives always referred to at the time as "Eskimos" visiting Seattle, and Alaska shopkeepers functioning as middlemen. Once the novel was ended, Master Humphrey's Clock added a concluding scene, where Master Humphrey's friends after he has finished reading the novel to them complain that the 'single gentleman' is never given a name; Master Humphrey tells them that the novel was a true story, that the 'single gentleman' was in fact Master Humphrey himself, and that the events of A Curious Old Shop first three chapters were fictitious, intended only to introduce the characters.

Some of the short stories act as frame stories to the novels. The estate's collection of totem poles, whale bones, and other curiosities replete with a Japanese-style teahouse and a miniature log cabin drew sightseeing tourists in its own right.
