Much had transpired since the American Revolution, however, and the message of John Trumbull's painting was only with time and the buffer of a second war with Britain, the War of 1812, that he was able to obtain a government commission, but his later paintings of the American Revolution were essentially enlarged versions of his earlier compositions from the 1780s. By 1819, the popular understanding of this historical moment favoured the evidence of the signatures on the document of the Declaration of Independence itself, not the more nuanced, first-hand vision of events told to Trumbull in 1783 by Thomas Jefferson and John Adams.
