In doing so, it explores further than the dichotomous debate between the American realists and liberals, adding finesse to the often simplified discussions on how to deal with the rising China. Trust and Mistrust in International Relations. Thus, the US army might sustain a light footprint in Europe, but US naval and air forces are likely to be concentrated in the Asia-Pacific.

Responding to the increased importance of Asia and Asian security issues in the 21st century, the Centre has identified global power shift, geopolitical developments, military developments in Asia, naval power, and energy security as the priority fields of research, and the Centre also analyses what these developments could mean for Norway and Europe. The growth and integration of China, however, has exposed China's closest neighbours and even more remote countries to its various previously internal problems, and the lagging political openness of China has often negatively impacted on cooperation with other countries in dealing with these problems i.
