It is impossible, however, to determine the chronological relation between these two dialogues with certainty see note 7 and thus impossible to infer which of the two schemes Plato might have thought to be the more definitive. It is then tempting to use this simile and the discussion of sexual reproduction 91c-d to shed light on Aristotle's theory of reproduction:

However, it also shows that, as in the case of man, in the cosmic realm there is a moving along, Timaeus traces madness to overly seeded marrow 86c-d not to wickedness, as some do: Maybe Timaeus wanted to get a rise from his companions. What is his origin and nature? Why is so close a connection drawn between man and plants? Continuing to hope for teleological causal explanations but finding them elusive, Socrates settles for a second best account: Others, he confesses, may cast theirs for another 55d.
